The proposed monitoring cycle discussed above provides a practical road map for informing performance decision-making. We would suggest that viewing external workload, internal workload, perceptual well-being and readiness to train/compete data in combination provides more meaningful individual training prescriptions than making interpretations based on data from any single athlete monitoring tool in isolation.

What you need to know A 67 year old woman with no significant medical history required urgent orthopaedic surgery after a fall. In preparation, her bloods were collected and a random cortisol was requested, which came back at 763 nmol/L. She did not have diabetes or hypertension. The anaesthetist reviewed and commented: "High cortisol, not safe for surgery until further evaluation."
